Alaska's Conservation Challenges

If you missed the informative presentation by Lauren Hierl, National Audubon Alaska Policy Associate, here is a summary of the issues

Alaska is by far the largest state in the US, and contains unparalleled public lands and wildlife. Many species that are rare or declining in the Lower 48 are still thriving and abundant in Alaska, such as salmon, wolves and grizzly bears. Alaska also provides a home to rare species like America's entire polar bear population, Steller's and spectacled eiders, musk oxen, and wolverines.

In the Arctic region of Alaska, oil and gas development threaten some of the most productive and important wildlife habitats.

One area of particular concern is the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. This region is often described as "America's Serengeti" for its abundant and diverse wildlife and pristine, untouched nature. Audubon and partners have worked to get legislation introduced in the US House and Senate to permanently protect this region from development, and will continue working hard to get this legislation passed.

Similarly, Teshekpuk Lake in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska has been under threat in recent years. This area is one of the most important wetland complexes in the entire Arctic, and provides valuable calving and nursing grounds for caribou plus nesting grounds for millions of birds, including tens of thousands of geese who come to the area from all over the world to molt.

Last year the Bush administration tried to open this incomparable region to oil and gas leasing, but there was a huge public outcry from across the country that led the Bush administration to put a 10-year moratorium on leasing in the Teshekpuk Lake region. We are excited by this temporary victory, but are still working hard to get this area permanently protected.

Audubon is also working to conserve lands in the Tongass National Forest, our country's largest national forest. This area contains the largest remaining extent of old-growth coastal temperate rainforest in the world. Logging over the past 50+ years has destroyed much of the old growth forest.

Audubon and TNC recently conducted a large-scale study to identify the most important remaining wildlife habitats in the Tongass. This study has been the baseline for negotiations with people in various industries in the region to try and conserve a large portion of the remaining intact forest, while restoring areas previously damaged by logging, and allowing the local way-of-life and communities to thrive. Negotiations continue, and we hope to get federal legislation introduced to protect millions of acres of the Tongass within the next couple years.

Anyone interested in learning more about these issues or who wants to take action to help protect our amazing public lands in Alaska should contact Lauren Hierl (lhierl@audubon.org). Great ways to stay involved include Letters to the Editor, in-district meetings or contacting your legislators.
